Newsy Notes and Gossip From the Footlights.

John Drew gives this interesting statement to an interviewer in New York on dramatizations:

"Regarding a play simply as a play," said Mr. Drew, "and without reference to the novel from which the play is taken, I cannot see that the dramatization of books can be harmful in the least degree. If a good play more—and the supply of good play more—and the supply of good play is far below the demand. If a poor play, why, there is just one more disappointment for the dramatist, the author, the manager, the public, and the actor. As with any other play, it inst resolves itself into a question of how the work has been done.

"It is not by any means an easy matter either to dramatize a popular novel or to act the hero of it. The dramatist is confronted with a vast deal of material, perhaps 500 pages, to compress into a little more than two hours. To do this and preserve the characters of the poraries are publishing goomy editorial comments upon the alleged decline of dramatic authorship. These jeremaids are based chiefly upon the fact that the many dramatizations of popular novels now upon the boards seem to have supplanted original dramatic work to a wide extent.

"Dramatizations, if they be well made, are worthy to be classed with plays whose plots and characters originate in the brains of their authors. Shakespeare founded many of his plays of the lengther of the birds off the bushes;" others, like Mrs. Oldfield's, the proper interpreter of rip-work to a wide extent.

"Dramatizations, if they be well made, are worthy to be classed with plays whose plots and characters originate in the brains of their authors. Shakespeare founded many of his plays upon legends and literature. But he took dross and converted it into gold with the magic of his genius.

"It is true that many of the dramatizations now current are cheap and tawdry affairs, based upon the catchepenny lea of profiting by the vogue of a successful novel. It does not follow, however, that dramatizations skillfully made, or plays suggested by or unded upon works adapted to transference to the stage, may not equal in point of dramatic originality plays not thus conceived.
